Manganese price bottoming but recovery likely modest: Eramet

- Manganese prices have bottomed out in India during Dec'23, in line with global trends, with domestic major MOIL effecting hikes
- Global market is likely to move into slight deficit in CY24 from slight surplus, per Eramet; however, inventory support exists
- Consensus view suggests modest 7% recovery in global prices in CY24 from current levels

We summarise recent commentary from Eramet (Not Rated) – a leading global manganese producer, along with inputs from other stakeholders, to gauge pricing trends.

Manganese prices bottoming out...: Manganese prices declined 20% in CY23 following passthrough of lower production costs amid a slight global market surplus. This year, we note early signs of a bottoming out, with the index price rising from US$ 4 per dry metric tonne unit in Dec'23 to US$ 4.3/dmtu for China CIF 44% grade ore in Feb'24. The recovery is being supported by a supply response from marginal producers by way of a temporary curtailments of both manganese and alloy supplies, along with logistical issues in the Red Sea that are helping shore up European alloy prices.

...but recovery likely to be modest: Eramet indicated a modest consensus price forecast of US$ 4.6/dmtu for manganese in CY24, with more support for the recovery expected in H2CY24 as steel demand gains traction in China and global markets.

Global market to enter slight deficit in CY24: Eramet expects the global market for manganese to transition to a small deficit this year from a nominal surplus last year. Available inventory could support the market during CY24.

Demand closely tied to steel outlook: With more than 97% of manganese being used in steel, its demand outlook tracks the steel production outlook. Global steel major ArcelorMittal expects a rebound in apparent steel consumption in CY24, with 3-4% growth outside China on inventory rebuild and 0-2% growth in China (see our note of 9 Feb 2024: Steel recovery in CY24 – ArcelorMittal).

Global supply response: In response to lower prices, Eramet highlights that it is noting temporary supply curtailments, particularly in South Africa, the largest manganese producer. However, dispatches are likely to increase this year from Gabon, the second largest producer, as it recovers from rail disruptions in H1CY23.

Implications for India: Though Indian manganese prices have likely bottomed out in December, global inputs point to a modest recovery ahead, akin to worldwide trends. State-owned miner MOIL (Not Rated) has the largest exposure to the metal.

Additional inputs

- Manganese price recovery in India: In line with global trends, state-owned manganese ore mining company MOIL began to raise prices from Jan'24, starting with a 5% hike in the 25% and 30% silico manganese grades or SMGR, followed by a 5% increase in <44% grade ore in February. Recently in March, the company raised prices of all three grades by 3% and of the >44% grade by 6%.
- Manganese alloy supply also responding to weaker prices: Eramet highlights temporary closure of several manganese alloy furnaces in Europe and a slowdown of imports from India due to the logistical disruption in the Red Sea. This is extending some support to prices of the alloy in Europe. However, Eramet also notes that these closures are temporary and supply could return as margins move back into positive territory.
- New alloy supply under development: Separately, commodities research advisory CPM Group has flagged that ~60 manganese ferroalloy projects are scheduled to start production globally over CY24 and CY25. All these projects are located outside China and have the potential to increase global manganese ferroalloy production capacity by 6%.
